Plā'to nĭsm, n. [Fr. Platonisme.]

1. The doctrines of Plato and his followers.

☞ Plato believed God to be an infinitely wise, just, and powerful Spirit, and that he formed the visible universe out of pre-existent amorphous matter, according to perfect patterns or ideas eternally existent in his own mind. Philosophy he considered as being a knowledge of the true nature of things, as discoverable in those eternal ideas after which all things were fashioned. In other words, it is the knowledge of what is eternal, exists necessarily, and is unchangeable, not of the temporary, the dependent, and changeable; and of course it is not obtained through the senses, neither is it the product of the understanding, which concerns itself only with the variable and the transitory, nor is it the result of experience and observation, but it is the product of our reason, which, as partaking of the divine nature, has innate ideas resembling the eternal ideas of God. By contemplating these innate ideas, reasoning about them, and comparing them with their copies in the visible universe, reason can attain that true knowledge of things which is called philosophy. Such appears to have been the system of Plato himself, so far as it can be gathered from his Dialogues, which are not systematic treatises, but free conversations. His professed followers, the Academics and the New Platonists, differed considerably from him, and are called Platonists. Murdock

Angle of polarization Circular polarization Elliptic polarization Plane of polarization Plane polarization Polarization of light Polars of light If a beam of light which has been reflected from a plate of unsilvered glass at an angle of about 35° be received upon a second plate of glass similar to the former and at the same angle of incidence the light will be readily reflected when the two planes of incidence are parallel to each other, but will not be reflected when the two planes of incidence are perpendicular to each other The light has, therefore, acquired new properties by reflection from the first plate of glass, and is called polarized light, while the modification which the light has experienced by this reflection is called polarization The plane in which the beam of light is reflected from the first mirror is called the plane of polarization The angle of polarization is the angle at which a beam of light must be reflected, in order that the polarization may be the most complete The term polarization was derived from the theory of emission and it was conceived that each luminous molecule has two poles analogous to the poles of a magnet Light may be polarized in several other methods as by refraction through most crystalline media or by being transmitted obliquely through several plates of glass with parallel faces If a beam of polarized light be transmitted through a crystal of quartz in the direction of its axis, the plane of polarization will be changed by an angle proportional to the thickness of the crystal This phenomenon is called circular polarization while the polarization first described is called plane polarization A beam of light reflected from a metallic surface acquires properties still more complex, to which the name of elliptic polarization has been given Loomis

Pro pōr'tion, n. [Lat. proportio, from pro, before, and portio, part or share, Fr. proportion, Pr. proporcio, Sp. proporcion, It. proporzione. See PORTION.]

1 The arrangement of parts; the relation or adaptation of one portion to another, or to the whole, with relation to magnitude or quantity; as, the proportion of the parts of a building or of the body.

3 Harmonizing relation between parts, or between different things of the same kind; symmetrical arrangement, distribution, or adjustment; as, to be out of proportion.

4 (Math.) (a) The equality or similarity of ratios, especially of geometrical ratios, or a relation among quantities such that the quotient of the first divided by the second is equal to that of the third divided by the fourth, — called also geometrical proportion, in distinction from arithmetical proportion, or that in which the difference of the first and second is equal to the difference of the third and fourth.

☞ Proportion differs from ratio. Ratio is the relation of two quantities of the same kind as the ratio of 5 to 10 or the ratio of 8 to 16. Proportion is the sameness of likeness of two such relations. Thus, 5 is to 10 as 8 to 16, that is, 5 bears the same relation to 10 as 8 does to 16. Hence, such numbers are said to be in proportion. Proportion is expressed by symbols thus: a : b :: c : d, or $\frac{a}{b} = \frac{c}{d}$.

Thus, 24, 16, 12, 9, are harmonical, for 24 : 9 :: 8 : 3. — In proportion, according as, to the degree that. "In proportion as they are metaphysically true, they are morally and politically false." Burke. — Reciprocal or inverse proportion, an equality between a direct and a reciprocal ratio, or a proportion in which the first term is to the second as the fourth is to the third, thus, 4 . 2 :: 3 . 6, or 4 . 2 :: 3 . 6 inversely. — Rhythmical proportion (Mus.), the proportion in relation to time or measure, between the notes representing duration, thus, the semibreve to the minim is 2 : 1, the semibreve to the crotchet 4 : 1.

Syn.—Ingenious, artful, far-fetched; affected; odd; whimsical; singular; unusual — QUAINT, ODD, WHIMSICAL. Quaint, in our early writers, meant nice or elegant, and hence ingenious In this sense it often occurs in Shakespeare; as, a quaint device, quaintly written, &c, and is used as a term of praise Gradually, however, there sprang up a perverted ingenuity in such writers as Quarles, and many among the Puritans, to which we now give the name of quaintness It is something queer and laughable, but not foolish The quaint writers have usually strong thought, but a strange and whimsical way of expressing it Their wit is sly, but odd, their images are often far-fetched or unnatural, and there is a strange contrast between the gravity of their thoughts and the fanciful or whimsical garb in which they are presented Hence the word became a term of dispraise, denoting affected, which Johnson declared to be its meaning in his day At present (perhaps from a deference to the old writers mentioned) it has received the united sense of antique and odd Thus we speak of the quaint architecture of many old buildings in London, or a quaint expression, uniting at once the antique and the fanciful, &c

R.

R, the eighteenth letter of the English alphabet, is a semi vowel and a liquid According to some orthoepists, it has two distinct sounds the one heard at the beginning of words and syllables, and when it is preceded by a consonant, being produced by an expulsion of vocalized breath, the tongue almost touching the palate, or gum, near the front teeth, with a more or less tremulous motion, the other, less decidedly consonantal, heard at the end of words and syllables, and when it is followed by a consonant, being formed by a vibration of the lower part of the tongue, near the root, against the soft palate The first is heard in ran, free, morose, the second in her, ford, starling Others regard the second of the two sounds as merely a guttural modification of the first, and not, therefore, essentially differing from it By most writers, however, no distinction whatever is admitted, the letter r being considered to have one unvarying sound in all cases See Principles of Pronunciation, §§ 87–89 In words derived from the Greek language, an h is usually written after r, as the representative of the aspirated sound with which this letter was pronounced by the Greeks It is the same in the Welsh language But as the letter is not aspirated in English, the h is entirely superfluous, and does not affect the sound of r, as in rhapsody, rheum, rhetoric, which are pronounced rapsody, reum, retoric In etymology, r is susceptible of numerous interchanges, the most common of which is with l The Chinese, who can not pronounce r, always use l in its place the Japanese do precisely the reverse It is sometimes called the canine letter, from some fancied resemblance which it bears in sound to the snarling of a dog "R is the dog's letter, and hurreth in the sound"
